In what Winston Churchill called its darkest hour, Britain's survival as an

the summer of 1940
rested on the shoulders of a small number of young men. They came to be referred to as 'The Few', a term that was immortalised by the Prime Minister in a speech to the House of Commons in August 1940, and which now

transform the fearful days of the summer of 1940 when Britain stood on the brink of invasion.
To many, they were the heroes of the age.

Though seen as the knights of the air, the reality was that these young men knew only too painfully well that each day might be their last. One moment of carelessness, one mistake, one effort too far, could prove fatal, as was so often the case. The stories of many of those who survived the Battle of Britain, and indeed the Second World War, are told in this fascinating collection of obituaries of 'The Few' published in The Daily Telegraph.

With some 180 or more individual biographies, the book is divided into three main sections:
those who flew Spitfires; the Hurricane pilots; and then the remaining aircrew,
including those who served on Blenheims or Defiants, and ground personnel. Included in this compilation are the stories are told here.

During World War II,
agents of the Special Operations Executive
(SOE) infiltrated
Japanese-occupied Malaya. There they worked with Malayan guerrilla groups, including the communist-sponsored Malayan Peoples Anti-Japanese Army (MPAJA), regarded as the precursor of the communist insurgent army of the Malayan Emergency. This book traces the development of SOE's Malayan operations, and analyses the interactions between SOE and the various guerrilla groups. It explores the reasons for and the extent of Malay disillusionment with Japanese rule, and demonstrates how guerrilla service acted as a training ground for some later Malay leaders of the independent nation.

However, the reports

doing so she provides new insights into the British post-war intelligence in Malaya.
